Being a Lean Co-ordinator or Lean Manager can be an exciting job, but is often also difficult and frustrating. Lean co-ordinators face many dilemmas in successfully achieving change from within an organisation. The ability to influence, teach, implement, and be patient are critical. The pace of change often requires balancing the need to be patient with the risk of being a maverick without people on board. The lean coordinator needs external knowledge of good practice to guide the selection of tools. Leadership potential and the wisdom and acumen of the lean co-ordinator is critical, which means successful lean co-ordinators often become Senior Managers.
